More than a quarter-million people have signed an online petition on Tuesday calling for the removal of a controversial statue of Abraham Lincoln in St. Louis. Activist and blogger Shaun King started the petition after the city announced on Sunday it was moving the statue to a new location near where it stands. The issue became public last month when Mayor Lyda Krewson called for the statue of Lincoln to be relocated to a new park in North St. Louis. In a statement, the St. Louis Regional Port Authority said they were aware of the petition and called the move "discriminatory" and "unfortunate." "We feel that the North side of the City is still an underrepresented area. We believe there are other, non-divisive and non-discriminatory ways of marking this important part of our history," the statement said. The four-foot statue of Abraham Lincoln was installed in August at the site of a jail where he was imprisoned after being elected president in 1861. However, the statue was criticized for displaying the southern leader in a Confederate uniform. Krewson said the statue was brought to the city from a private collection in 2001 and had been declared a public monument in 2006. "It's reflective of its location," the mayor told reporters. King said the move was "really about the very poor decision-making of the mayor" and said the statue should be removed immediately. "This is a very powerful symbol of our continued struggle to abolish slavery and have America be a place for everyone," he told the Washington Post. King's petition asked that the statue be returned to its original location, removed from the city's history books and covered with sheets and blankets. "I believe in bringing people together. To me, it's trying to be like the dark and light. A symbol of hope and redemption. It's something that cannot be denied. For some people, it still resonates," King told The Post. "But for a lot of people, it's a symbol of what they don't want to admit to in their own history, in their own lives and how far we've come." Anyone who's dealt with a wine-loving vegetarian before can probably attest to the mental gymnastics required to plan a meal for said individual and their vinous companions. I'm not a wine aficionado. If pressed, I'd probably admit I've probably tried the vinous equivalent of the flavors of Mentos and Coke; I've even had a glass or two (and a piece
