Depending on the level of quality you want, Lightroom, Photoshop or PhotoStudio can offer different levels of downsampling when creating a JPEG format. By downsampling, you find ways to get away with less quality, but file size will increase. With GigaPixels, the unit of measurement has been replaced with megapixels. Now, just think about the value you get in a creative product like Photoshop when using GigaPixels for image resolution instead of megapixels. The update also updates to a built-in (UI only), data transfer tool. Layers can now be tiled and zoomed independently of each other using the Layers Panel. This means you no longer have to open one layer and zoom out so that you can see the entire image. If you want to, you can just zoom in or out on the layer you'd like to display. The ability to create a selection for each distinct part of an image was extended to include layers. From now on, you'll be able to select layers or channels and set the view to only display those. Photoshop now uses the concept of layers to split and arrange content in the Layers Panel. You can now nest layers, including groups, smart objects and linked files, with a new "nesting" and "drill-down" tool. This capability supports smart objects and data-insensitive layers. Right now, you can fine-tune the parts of your image that you want to make its subject the center of attention. You can use content-aware fill, which allows you to better highlight and fill the center of your image, to help you accomplish this task. For example, you could use it to create a background for a logo or for a portrait of the brand's CEO. The public beta version of Creative Cloud is available to subscribers to the CC Photography and CC Video tiers.
